

Traits of Happy People

Happiness has been a human pursuit for as long as we can remember, and positive psychology has taken this concept into the realm of scientific research in hopes of gaining a better understanding of global wellbeing and meaningful living.

Whether on a global or an individual level, the pursuit of happiness is one that is gaining grip and scientific recognition.

Happiness is hard to find for many people. There are several inherent traits that happy people have, but is it possible to teach yourself to embrace and adopt them? It all starts with knowing the secrets of happiness.

Explaining happiness in the simplest ways

Each of us may define happiness in different ways. It can be an expression of positive feelings or an experience of pure pleasure.

In psychology, happiness is described as an emotion of joy and satisfaction and can be associated with overall well-being.

Furthermore, we all have different sources of happiness. Personally, spending time with my favorite people and having the ability to take care of myself can make me happy. For some, it can be cuddling with their pet or traveling to their dream destination.

Happiness is hard to find, and some people spend their whole lives winning promotions, earning money, and spending time with people only to find that happiness has avoided them. It's common knowledge that happiness is about more than objective wealth or what you do in life--it's about your perspective, and about how you react to things that happen around you.

Happiness isn't about reaching a destination or achieving a goal; it's about enjoying the journey that is life. Staying grateful for what you have, focused on the present, and positive no matter what comes at you can help you finally unlock the happiness you deserve. You're in control of your own emotions, so maintain a better attitude and a better outlook, and happiness is sure to follow.

Traits of happy people:

There are seven critical traits that only genuinely happy people have, and if you want to find happiness and satisfaction in your own life, you'll have to learn to incorporate them:

1. Gratitude:

Gratitude is essential for happiness. You have to truly appreciate everything you have in life in order to be satisfied with it. If you don't feel grateful, you're always going to be looking for more, no matter how much you already have. You could make minimum wage or a six-figure salary and still constantly lust after more instead of being grateful you have a job. You could have hard feelings about your parents and wish that they were different instead of appreciating the fact that they're alive and well. Express your gratitude, openly and often, for all the great things in your life, and forget what you "could" have--focus on what you do have.

2. Live in the moment:

Happy people let go of the past, including their triumphs and mistakes. They realize that the only moment they can truly live and do anything about is the present, so they don't get caught in thoughts about the future, either.

Happy people tend to live in the moment. They aren't preoccupied with things they've done in the past, and they aren't constantly thinking about the future. It doesn't matter whether these thoughts are positive or negative; you could think very positively about the future, but if you aren't focused on the present moment, you aren't going to be happy in the present moment. It's important to remember the past, but it's harmful to dwell in it, just like it's important to plan for the future, but it's harmful to obsess over it. Focus on being happy right now.

3. Humor:

Humor is also important, no matter who you are or where you work. Truly happy people are typically able to find humor in almost anything. They appreciate jokes and aren't afraid to laugh out loud when they think something is funny. Laughing is shown to be beneficial not only for your emotional health, but also your physical health. It releases endorphins, helps you relax, and helps you manage stress better. Even the simple act of smiling can carry some of these effects, so if you want to be happier in your own life, start laughing and smiling whenever you can, and surround yourself with others who appreciate humor.

4. Optimistic:

They expect good things to happen. They feel positive. The glass is half full. They try to make sense of events in an optimistic and positive way.

Optimism is a positive mental attitude or sunny disposition that's characterized by hope and confidence in the future, as well as a sense of power to achieve your desired goals. A happy person is optimistic because they have hope for the future and they are confident that they can achieve their goals.

The power of positive thinking cannot be overstated. Simply believing that things will work out in the end will help you manage your stress on a regular basis and think more positively about your current situation. Optimists find the best in everything and aren't ever consumed with the need to search for faults. Constantly viewing the world through a positive lens will make the world seem more positive, and you'll be happier to live in it as a result. Fostering optimism can be tough, especially if you're used to a cynical line of thinking, but with practice, it's possible to change your outlook.

No matter what life throws their way, they always manage to see the bright side of things. This helps them stay positive and upbeat, even when things are tough.

5. Extroverted:

We do not know if happiness makes people more extroverted or if extroversion causes happiness, but statistically, they correlate. Happy people tend to be very social and enjoy spending time with their friends and family. They love having a good time and laughing until their stomachs hurt. This sense of joy and happiness is contagious, which is why so many people want to be around them.

5. Have close relationships:

That shows up most obviously in surveys, which tell us that married people are usually happier than unmarried people. But it's not a question of marriage; close, trusting relationships of any kind tend to help people be happy more readily than they would be without.

6. Creative:

They look at problems from as many viewpoints as possible and find creative ways of handling those problems. They follow sparks of interest. They don't let life become sedentary. They keep producing new ideas and learning new things.

A happy person is more likely to be creative because he or she is in a good mood and able to channel new ideas instead of focusing on things that aren't working. They are also more likely to have an open mind.

7. Self-confident:

A happy person is self-confident in his or her own skin. They know who they are and what they're worth, which gives them a sense of purpose and direction. They're also open to new experiences and take risks. Happy people have a realistic (not arrogant) faith in their abilities. As a result, they feel equipped to deal with life's challenges.

8. Compassionate: (sympathetic)

A happy person is someone who is compassionate because they have empathy for others, which means that they understand how other people feel and try to make them feel better.

They are kind to others and they want the best for them. Their innate sense of compassion for others leads to a greater sense of purpose in life.

9. Loving:

Happy people are often more loving than those who are not as content with their lives. They typically have a more positive outlook on life and are less likely to let anger or frustration get the best of them.

10. Fair:

Happy people are often considered to be more fair in their dealings with others. Researchers at the University of California at Berkeley conducted a study on the personality traits of happy people, and found that they are typically more agreeable and less aggressive than those who are not as happy. This may be because happy people have a more positive outlook on life, and are therefore less likely to feel the need to take things out on others.

11. Energetic:

Happy people have a lot of energy and are always on the go looking for new adventures and new challenges to take on. This is one of the main reasons why they are so fulfilled – because they are constantly doing things that make them happy.

12. Trusting:

The happiest people are trusting and grateful. They are confident and have a sense of purpose in their lives. They also have a strong, supportive social network.

13. Empathetic:

The happier people are, the more empathetic they are. A happy person is being able to see the good in others. They also have higher self-esteem and less anxiety than unhappy people. Happy people are respectful. They have a strong sense of empathy and can easily put themselves in someone else's shoes. This allows them to be more understanding and less judgmental of others. Happy people also have a positive outlook on life, which makes them more accommodating and pleasant to be around.

14. Forgiving:

A happy person is someone who has an overall positive outlook on life and is able to forgive others for their mistakes. This characteristic makes them more understanding and compassionate when dealing with other people's problems. They are also more likely to forgive themselves for their own mistakes, which means they can move forward in life instead of dwelling on the past.