

"Liberalism"

Idealism has been argued to be a relatively short-lived school of thought, and advocates particularly suffered a crisis of confidence following the failure of the League of Nations and the outbreak of World War II. However, subsequent theories of international relations have significantly drawn elements from Wilsonian-style idealism when constructing their world views. In addition, scholars describing themselves either as idealists or as sympathetic to the school of thought have remained active in international relations studies. The main theory was liberalism. Liberalism is a social school of thought in international relations theory that developed in the 1970s.

Basic concept :-

Liberalism is a theory that focus on democracy and cooperation. Liberalists belief that individual share many interests and can engage in cooperation.

"Liberalism is a political and moral philosophy based on liberty, consent of the governed and equality before the law"

It was a positive view of human nature and belief in progress. It focused on value of order, justice and tolerance into international relation. It implements international organization as policy choice. it points that international law organizations and non-governmental organization are equally important. International institutions and global commerce are its main instrument.

Main components:-

The main components of liberalism are listed below:-

1. Democratic Peace Theory

Democratic peace theory argues that democracies rarely, if ever, go to war with one another. Generally speaking, democratic governments focus mostly on maintaining internal stability, ensuring that their respective populations have all of their social, political and economic needs properly satisfied. The democratic peace theory purports that a spread of democracy will result in greater international peace and that democratic political institutions make it so that governments are blocked from initiating war without the consent of the electorate.

2. Rejection of Power Politics

Liberalism is the active rejection of power politics and the prioritization of cooperative policies that circumvent the need for warfare and aggression. Through the eschewing of power politics, aspiring diplomats and political professionals gain an increased understanding of cooperation among nations and how compromise brings about more favorable outcomes than conflict.

3. Moderator Role of International Law

* Those who follow liberal political theory believe the role of international law to be one of moderation. International law differs from state or national legal systems in that it is predominantly applicable to countries and their leaders, rather than a nation's private citizens. States who have agreed to a treaty and have accepted the authority of the International Court of Justice, which was established by the Charter of the United Nations, are subject to the Court's rulings. With proper diplomacy and the right governing institutions in place, liberal theorists believe that states can work together to maximize prosperity and minimize conflict—a valuable asset for state actors.

5. Potential Purpose of Cosmopolitanism

Cosmopolitanism is the ideology that all humans share a common morality, linking them to a single community. Cosmopolitanism and liberalism both accept power as an important aspect of existence, but do not view it as all-encompassing. Those who practice liberalism in international politics may adopt a cosmopolitan stance and push for international institutions to foster the creation of a larger global citizenship—one that pushes to advance all of human society in a positive fashion.

6. International Cooperation

As opposed to the aggression of realist theory—which assumes that power or military might is, or should be, the primary goal of political action—liberalism believes that power should be measured or amassed instead through state economies, political freedoms and rights along with the possibilities of peace and cooperation. It claims that progress in human history can best be measured by the elimination of global conflict and the extent to which democracies have transcended violent instincts.

7. Leverage of Nongovernmental Diplomats

Liberalism sees the implementation of international organizations and nongovernmental bodies to help shape state preferences, such as globalization, and public policy. In liberal theories of international politics, multi state political formations and nongovernmental forces influence foreign policy as a means of increasing international cooperation.

8. Institutional Liberalism

Institutional liberalism helps to facilitate activities that are beneficial to states (such as trade), reduces transnational fears that can result in tension, and provides a flow of information as well as opportunities to negotiate between states in the event of tensions over arms control or economics. From the Institutional Liberalism perspective, institutions such as the European Union (EU), the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), or the UN, can enhance the ability of governments to monitor others' compliance. Ultimately, the goal is for states to see institutions as mutually beneficial; a good example is NATO, which uses transnational ties to create a security community among Western countries.

Conclusion

A core argument of liberalism is that concentrations of unaccountable violent power are the fundamental threat to individual liberty and must be restrained. The primary means of restraining power are institutions and norms at both domestic and international level. At the international level institutions and organizations limit the power of states by fostering cooperation and providing a means for imposing costs on states that violate international agreements. Economic institutions are particularly effective at fostering cooperation because of the substantial benefits that can be derived from economic interdependence. Finally, liberal norms add a further limitation on the use of power by shaping our understanding of what types of behaviour are appropriate. Today, it is clear that liberalism is not a 'Utopian' theory describing a dream world of peace and happiness as it was once accused of being. It provides a consistent rejoinder to realism, firmly rooted in evidence and a deep theoretical tradition.

"Behaviouralism"

Introduction:-

Behaviouralism is an approach in political science that emerged in the 1930s in the United States. The origins of behaviouralism is often attributed to the work of University of Chicago professor Charles Merriam, who in the 1920s and 1930s emphasized the importance of examining political behaviour of individuals and groups rather than only considering how they abide by legal or formal rules.

From 1942 through the 1970s, behaviouralism gained support. It was probably Dwight Waldo who coined the term in a book called "Political Science in the United States". David Easton however popularized the term. It was the site of discussion between traditionalist and new emerging approaches to political science.

Main concept:-

Behaviouralists seek to examine the behaviour, actions, and acts of individuals – rather than the characteristics of institutions such as legislatures, executives, and judiciaries – and groups in different social settings and explain this behavior as it relates to the political system.

✓ Characteristics Features of Behaviouralism

The eight characteristics features of behaviouralism as given by David Easton are as follows:

1. Regularities: There are discover-able uniformities in political behavior can be expressed in generalizations or theories with explanatory and predictive value.
2. Verification: The validity of such generalizations must be testable, in principle, by reference to relevant behavior.
3. Techniques: Means for acquiring and interpreting data ... need to be examined self-consciously, refined, and validated.
4. Quantification: Precision in the recording of data and the statement of findings require measurement and quantification.
5. Values: Ethical evaluation and empirical explanation involve two different kinds of propositions that, for the sake of clarity, should be kept analytically distinct.
6. Systematization: Theory and research are to be seen as closely intertwined parts of a coherent and orderly body of knowledge.

7. Pure science: The understanding and explanation of political behavior logically precede and provide the basis for efforts to utilize political knowledge in the solution of urgent practical problems of society.

8. Integration: Because the social sciences deal with the whole human situation, political research can ignore the findings of other disciplines only at the peril of weakening the validity and undermining the generality of its own results.

Criticism:-

The approach has come under fire from both conservatives and radicals for the purported value-neutrality. Conservatives see the distinction between values and facts as a way of undermining the possibility of political philosophy. Neal Riemer believes behaviouralism dismisses "the task of ethical recommendation" because behaviouralists believe "truth or falsity of values (democracy, equality, and freedom, etc.) cannot be established scientifically and are beyond the scope of legitimate inquiry."

Christian Bay believed behaviouralism was a pseudopolitical science and that it did not represent "genuine" political research. Bay objected to empirical consideration taking precedence over normative and moral examination of politics.

Behaviouralism initially represented a movement away from "naive empiricism", but as an approach has been criticized for "naive scientism". Additionally, radical critics believe that the separation of fact from value makes the empirical study of politics impossible.
